Editorial Review

Review

The authors of this book cover critical issues in music education in ways that are thoughtful, reflective, and informed. As such issues are examined, this book can serve as a valuable resource for music education research projects, some of which will involve practitioners and pupils in context, and others on musical learning in formal and informal settings. This is not a prescriptive "how to" book but rather an insightful approach to methodological enquiry with a strong foundation constructed from the current literature. Betty Anne Younker, Dean and Professor of Music Education, Western University, Canada This is an inspired book that challenges music education researchers and practitioners alike to consider 'what counts as research'. The many articulate voices from the classroom contained here show not just how to research in educational settings, but also why it is worthwhile. This book could make a real difference to teachers, pupils and researchers - and to a better mutual understanding between all involved in music education. Stephanie E. Pitts, Reader in Music, University of Sheffield, UK This is a fascinating collection of research projects rooted in the everyday realities of classroom music. What makes the book special is that the research is undertaken by relatively new teachers of music. Consequently there is a freshness and vitality about their narratives, which are imaginatively woven together by the two distinguished editors. Trainee music teachers will derive both motivation and inspiration in reading this book, so that hopefully they will strive to improve their own practice, and start to change things for the better. Gordon Cox, former Senior Lecturer in Music Education, University of Reading, UK
